At the University of Houston, our student athletes are not graded by the number of games won or lost, but by the amount of willpower and resolve they use to face any obstacle. These are the characteristics of a true champion, and at UH, this is the core curriculum we teach.

Our athletes double major in grit and determination.
New and renovated venues at the University of Houston are changing the landscape of the sports scene in the city.

The pages that have been written about the University’s storied program are some of the most impressive in the nation. From Phi Slama Jama and “The Game of the Century” to Carl Lewis and Olympic gold, our student-athletes are more determined than ever to write their own pages in our story. Now we’re heading into a new frontier and new level of play.

Last year, UH joined the American Athletic Conference, a conference at the forefront of Division 1 athletics. This year, the conference entered into new television contracts with ESPN and CBS Sports, a move that gives the University of Houston unprecedented national exposure. And now, new and renovated venues at the University of Houston are changing the landscape of the sports scene in the city. The new football stadium, currently being built on the site of Robertson Stadium, will seat over 40,000 fans.

Building champions for life demands integrity, excellence, inclusivity and sportsmanship in perfect balance - the core curriculum we teach at the University of Houston. These are the characteristics that have built our storied program.
