Arming Mother Nature: The Birth of Catastrophic Environmentalism

Presented by

Jacob Hamblin, Ph.D., Oregon State University

Friday, October 18, 2013
11:00 A.M. - 12:30 P.M.
University of Houston
232 Philip G. Hoffman Hall

Professor Hamblin argues that military planning for World War III essentially created "catastrophic environmentalism": the idea that human activity might cause global natural disasters. This awareness, Hamblin shows, emerged out of dark ambitions, as governments poured funds into environmental science after World War II, searching for ways to harness natural processes in order to gain military advantage. Proposals included the use of nuclear weapons to create artificial tsunamis or melt the ice caps to drown coastal cities; setting fire to vast expanses of vegetation; and changing local climates. This work raised questions that went beyond the goal of weaponizing nature. "Perhaps one of the surprises is not how little was known about environmental change, but rather how much," Hamblin maintains.

“iCount: A Data Quality Movement for Asian American and Pacific Islanders”

Presented by

Dr. Robert Tarnish

October 23, 2013
12:30-2:00 p.m. in the Kiva of Farish Hall

A light lunch will be served. Please contact Elizabeth Gonzales at egonzales2@uh.edu for more information.

Our lecture’s motto – Every student counts! Making every student visible! – is adopted from the National Commission on Asian American and Pacific Islander Research in Education. Dr. Teranishi will discuss the need to change current data collection practices that combine Asian American and Pacific Islander (AAPI) subgroups, thus masking disparities of underserved communities. In regards to education attainment level, for example, 33.9% of Cambodians, 32.8% of Laotians, and 29.4% of Vietnamese in the U.S. report having less than a high school education, compared to 13.4% of Pakistanis, 9% of Asian Indians, 7.7% of Filipinos, and 5.2% of Japanese with the same level. Without such disaggregated data, educational institutions lack the critical, in-depth information needs to identify and effectively respond the needs of students confronted with educational challenges. As the fastest growing demographic in the country, it is imperative to address educational barriers confronting the AAPI community if we are to meet the President’s goal of graduating the highest proportion of college graduates by 2020.
