Why Liberal Arts?

“It is not very important for a person to learn facts. For that he does not really need a college. He can learn them from books. The value of an education is a liberal arts college is not learning of many facts but the training of the mind to think if something that cannot be learned from textbooks.” — Albert Einstein.

- Employers want to hire individuals who can analyze, communicate, plan, research, think critically, and lead.
- Many companies often have their own way of training & developing new employees, so having the ability to learn and adapt while still possessing the skill gained from a liberal arts background is important.
- A education in the Liberal Arts allows students to adapt well to new environments and have the critical-thinking skills necessary to complete a variety of job duties.

What are employers looking for?

- Hiring managers are looking for people who can write, read, manage qualitative data, and be able to tell fact from distortion.
- They want candidates who have had experience conducting research and have proven ability to think systematically.
- They want people who have had experience working on group projects and who have had leadership experience during their academic history.
- Companies want to hire individuals with more than a single dimension or focus of their education; pure technical talent is no longer competitive enough in today’s job landscape.
- Employers want to hire students who have a broad educational foundation, with a wide array of skills and abilities that they can tailor to their organizational needs.

Soft-skills employers are looking for

- Communication, Teamwork, Flexibility, Positively Attitude

“More than any other curriculum, the liberal arts train people to think critically about concepts and society, look at the big picture, analyze cause and effect relationships, and break an idea or situation into component parents and put it back together and gain.” — Robert Goodward
