Biography:

Lindsay Cronk is an assistant librarian at the M.D. Anderson Library, serving as Coordinator of Online Resources and Collections (CORC) within the Liaison Services department. Her research interests include outcomes assessment, evidence-based decision making, information literacy instruction, information services, and digital librarianship. Prior to coming to UH, she worked with LYRASIS, a library services consortia. She has also worked as a grant writer, systems administrator, and waitress. Cronk received her BA from Agnes Scott College in 2006, majoring in International Relations and Studio Art. She completed her MLIS at Valdosta State University, concentrating on technical services. She is currently finishing her EdS in Instructional Technology through Georgia Southern University. Like many librarians, she considers herself a consummate generalist. Cronk has presented her original research on student research behavior at local, national and international conferences including the American Library Association's Annual Conference and the International Conference on Information Literacy. She is currently developing and implementing cross-applications of sabermetrics in library collection assessment.
